Amyloidosis occurs as a complication in more than 20% of patients with type 2 diabetes mellitus (T2DM) and is associated with a high morbidity and mortality. This review provides an update on the mechanisms of amyloidosis in T2DM, as well as the putative therapeutic strategies to prevent the development of the disease. We performed a PubMed search of the literature for the past 5 years with the key terms diabetes mellitus, amyloidosis, and anti-hyperglycemic agent. The prevalence of amyloidosis in T2DM ranges from 17% to 33%. No etiology is identified in about two-thirds of patients with T2DM-related amyloidosis. Amyloidosis in T2DM is associated with renal failure, autonomic neuropathy, lower limb amputation, and increased mortality. Insulin therapy, especially for a long duration, is the strongest independent risk factor for amyloidosis. Patients who develop new-onset or worsening renal dysfunction, autonomic neuropathy, or lower limb amputation require close follow-up. The incidence of amyloidosis is 1.5% to 2.4% per year in patients with T2DM and 10% to 30% in those with longstanding T2DM. Increased attention should be paid to the risk of amyloidosis in T2DM, especially for patients on insulin therapy for a long duration. Insulin therapy should be modified in T2DM patients who develop new-onset or worsening renal failure, autonomic neuropathy, or lower limb amputation. Anti-amyloid therapy is a promising therapeutic strategy, but trials have been initiated only in the United States.// Copyright 2012 The Go Authors.
